From the Chairperson

As I have watched the construction process on our new building take place over the past six months I am reminded of how critical all the unseen things are to the success of any endeavor. The old building was torn down and there was an excitement about the future. Then came the questions of, "Why isn't anything happening?" "Do they need our help?" Progress was happening but it was done behind the scenes to ensure success of the project. Over the past month the structural steel has gone up. Watching them work reminds me of a group of big kids playing with an erector set. I wondered if any of our current students' ever had to follow a plan to build one of the elaborate creations that I use to play with as a child.

Then in the introductory class I was reviewing with the students the history of the Family & Consumer Sciences field and the history of our department on campus. As a part of this, the students were asked to put general historical events and FCS related events into a timeline. Next they were asked to write about how some of those events have impacted the way they live their lives today. The groundwork that others lay determines the success for us in the future. Knowledge about and appreciation for the past brings a new respect for the efforts of others and for understanding the potential for the future.

As we move into this next year to begin the centennial celebration of our department and of our institution, we will help students to recognize the value of the past in opening the doors to their future. We will also help students to develop those habits that will allow their knowledge to make a difference. Please join us in our efforts to celebrate as we begin our next 100 years of making a difference.

-Duane A. Whitbeck, EdD

Making Memories, Impacting Generations, an interview with Ruth Rohde –by Cris Elliott

Making memories, that’s what Ruth Rohde has done throughout her life. She has etched the vision of home economics in the minds of countless people. These memories and visions were acclaimed in the Pittsburg Junior High classroom where Ruth spent 18 years teaching and motivating young people. I am one of those people. Ruth was my supervising teacher for pre-lab back in 1974. I have wonderful memories of observing her classroom and admiring her natural talents with people. She was truly an inspiration to me and many other FCS professionals.

Ruth grew up in Minden Mines, Missouri. In 1937 she got a bachelors degree in home economics from Kansas State Teacher’s College (What is now PSU). Her first job was teaching at Lamar High School. It was there that she met her husband, Martin. They were married in 1939 and had three children: Mary Anne, Drexel and Steve. Ruth pursued her career in education by both teaching and serving as principal at South Radley between the years of 1955-1960. She started teaching at Pittsburg Junior High in 1962 where she retired in 1981.

The classroom is not the only place that Ruth has contributed. She has always been an active member of the Pittsburg community. Some of the organizations that she has been especially active in include: Phi Upsilon Omicron, Delta Kappa Gamma, Sigma Sigma Sigma, KNEA and the First United Methodist Church.

Ruth is an outstanding alumnus for numerous reasons. She spent many years educating young people about the philosophy and purpose of home economics. This knowledge multiplied over several generations to improve the quality of family life in the Pittsburg area. Throughout Ruth’s teaching career, she also took the time to supervise and train many PSU students. Her classroom provided a stage for future teachers to gain experience and observe a caring and competent professional. Mary Kay Caldwell, former teacher and co-worker said, “she practiced the three F’s of teaching: firm, fair, and friendly.

Ruth has witnessed firsthand the revolutionary changes of our profession over the years. She can offer a wealth of information about family and consumer sciences and the journey we have survived. I love visiting with her about her early years in teaching and what her classroom was like. It’s a nostalgic trip back through many changes and transformations. Strong, professional women like Ruth made those changes happen.

Today, Ruth continues to support our department through her ongoing encouragement and support of students, faculty and staff. We extend our heartfelt appreciation for her continuous efforts as we recognize her as an outstanding alumni of our department. Thanks, Ruth.

New Faculty

Angie Dowell, Fashion Merchandising Instructor

Angie Dowell is new to Pittsburg State University this year as an assistant professor in the department. Her primary responsibility is overseeing the Fashion Merchandising part of the program. Ms. Dowell is originally from Center, Missouri. She completed both her B.S. and M.S. degrees in Human Environmental Sciences: Textile and Apparel Management from the University of Missouri-Columbia.

Ms. Dowell gained valuable field and teaching experience through her employment in retail sales, management, and buying positions, and in teaching as both a graduate assistant and adjunct instructor at the University of Missouri. She also worked as the assistant to the curator in the costume collection at Stephens College, Columbia, Missouri. Ms. Dowell’s research interests include dress and gender, and social appearance.

In discussing her interest in fashion she said, “I enjoy teaching Fashion Merchandising related courses because the industry is one that is ever-changing. Cultural, social, political, and economic factors all influence the world of fashion.

“In this respect, I need to teach and learn about a variety of factors that impact the business of fashion. It is this variety that makes the study and teaching of Fashion Merchandising so interesting.”

Sarah Bigler, Preschool Lead Teacher

Sarah Bigler, has joined the department as the lead teacher in the preschool lab. She is a recent graduate from Southwest Baptist University, in Bolivar, Missouri where she earned a Bachelors of Science in Elementary Education and a minor in Early Childhood. While earning her degree she gained experience working with children ages two to 15.

Sarah said, “On August 15th, I began planning the year I would spend with fifteen busy 3-5 year olds. Now as their teacher, I work with the children day by day preparing them for kindergarten. We work on basic everyday skills as well as knowledge I feel will help them to be successful when they leave the preschool and journey off to kindergarten. I have greatly enjoyed the past two months of working with the children and their families and look forward to watching the children learn and grow.”

Interview with Ann Altenhofen, Class of 2001 —by Duane Whitbeck

Some students come into the department not sure where they want to go, but knowing they have it within their power to make a difference. Ann was one of those students. As a senior, Ann was voted by her peers as the outstanding senior in Early Childhood Development during 2001. Ann is currently working for the Child Advocacy Center in Pittsburg. Her job is to work with families where abuse has taken place and prepare them for their court experience. Ann was interviewed because she is one of the new professionals from FCS that is quickly making a difference in her chosen professional field.

Following a class tour to The Children's Center of Southwest Missouri during her freshman year, Ann set a new career goal to work in the field of children's advocacy. That experience led her to her current position working in a similar program in Southeast Kansas. Ann currently helps to establish case review processes and assists in facilitating interagency communication. She is anticipating future training in forensic interviewing, and graduate school in social work or law.

When asked what helped her to be successful, Ann said that she learned through her courses and work experience to analyze things and look at the big picture. Other important lessons were to be politically astute, learn to listen before you talk, be willing to take initiative when you can make a difference and to be self-confident.

Ann said she regularly uses what she learned in her FCS courses. One point she made was that students don't realize that "having to write papers and make presentations helps to develop critical skills necessary for working as a professional after graduation." Students need to put themselves in positions where they can attend professional meetings, take on leadership roles in student organizations, and to network. "College is as much the habits you pick up while there, as it is the knowledge you learn about your specific discipline."

A display of garments from the Fashion Merchandising costume collection. Those shown above range from 1920 to 1970, but there are pieces in the collection that date as early as the 1870s.

The Future Home of Family and Consumer Sciences

The structural steel is up and the cement foundation should be completed soon.

Teacher Education students receive outstanding scholarship awards. Shelly Smith and Stephanie Schlagel with advisor Cris Elliott.

Interior Design student Janna Dunn completes an AutoCADD assignment in the new computer lab.

Early Childhood Development major Kellie Herndon teaches children in the preschool lab to play musical instruments.
