I, _____ (your name), warrant that the work in question, _____ (full title):

is entirely my own original scholarship and writing; references all ideas and distinctive phrasings derived from the works of others; includes no illustrations for which signed permissions have not been obtained (copies of which I have provided herewith); and expresses opinions for which I alone am responsible.

I warrant The Midwest Quarterly to make contractual agreements with services that provide reproduction of its contents in print, in computer databases, and/or online, but in turn I understand that The Midwest Quarterly has no interest in and will not prevent me from using this material substantially as it appeared in The Midwest Quarterly in an anthology or in revised form in a book or publication of my own choosing provided that this occurs after its original publication in The Midwest Quarterly. If for some reason I have an opportunity to bring the work out in book form prior to its appearance in The Midwest Quarterly, I will contact the Editor-in-Chief of The Midwest Quarterly to secure written permission which, unless a case for substantial damage to The Midwest Quarterly can be shown to occur, will be given as a matter of course. A standard scholarly notice providing the place and date of its original publication in The Midwest Quarterly must be made in whatever format it appears, and the name of the original author will never be removed from it. The author may not broadcast, post online, or place in the public domain the works in question for six months following the publication date of the journal issue in which the author's work first appears.
